safety, when a heightened gust of wind and enormous wave overset her in an instant. Her crew, consisting of two men and a boy, held on as long as their strength in a tempestuous surge permitted. The poor boy was visible the latest, still holding up his hands as he sank. In a very short time they had all disappeared. Had the life-boat belonging to this place been in readiness every one of them could have been saved. But it was twenty minutes after the accident before the life-boat touched the waves, and so hopeless was then spot where the already broken fragments of the vessel were floating, she returned back again. The fact is, that the life-boat, instead of being kept under a shed upon the pier, or slung alongside its inner wall (whence also it could be into smooth water, instead of being, as it is now, with the breakers), is kept in tide when
