Zambian stamps have wide appeal, retaining close ties with country

Africa

By Robert Pateman

Traditionally there were two routes into the interior of Africa, either through the well-established and civilized Cape and across the Limpopo River or from the island of Zanzibar.

The area that is now Zambia lies several hundred miles from each route, and although there had been Portuguese missionaries in Africa since the middle of the 16th century, it was to be nearly another 300 years before the first white man, David Livingstone, was to see the tumbling waters of Victoria Falls.

Figure 1. British South Africa Company stamps were used in Rhodesia until the 1920s.

Once the area had been mapped, the process of colonization was inevitable. In 1889, Cecil Rhodes announced that the British South Africa Company was to extend its rule north of the Zambezi River.

It wasn't until around 1909, however, that white settlers moved into the area in any great number. The opening of a railway from Victoria Falls to the copper region led to farms growing up along the rail route.

Throughout this period and on into the 1920s, the British South Africa Company maintained its rule over all of what was then Rhodesia.

The stamps issued there were those of the BSAC (Figure 1) and have already been covered in my previous article on Zimbabwe (Linn's Oct. 10, page 42).

In 1924, control of Rhodesia passed to the colonial office, and to ease administration problems, the territory was split into two regions to form Northern and Southern Rhodesia.

The following year the northern section issued a definitive set of 17 stamps ranging in value from ½ penny to 20 shillings and bearing a portrait of King George V with a background of hills and animals.

This design was common to all 17 stamps and was distinct from the design on the Southern Rhodesian stamps that had come out a few months before.

It is with this Northern Rhodesian issue that the separate story of Zambia stamps have their beginnings.

Throughout the 1930s, Northern Rhodesian stamps followed the pattern of most British colonies with omnibus sets in 1935 and 1937 to mark the silver jubilee and coronation, while a new definitive set released in 1938 replaced the stamps of the late king with those of his son, George VI (Figure 2).

This set was based on the design already in circulation with the new king facing right (instead of left as his father had done) and with the words "Postage and Revenue" omitted.

There were more omnibus sets in 1946 (for victory in the war), 1948 and 1949, but in 1953, Northern Rhodesia issued its first commemorative set, to mark the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II.

Although the building of the dam became symbolic of the success of the federation, there was, at the same time, a lot of criticism in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland that, although the dam had been built with federation money, the electricity it produced mainly went to serve the south.

This of course created a great deal of bad feeling and was one of the main reasons the union broke up.

The other reason for the federation's failure was the overwhelming opposition of the black Africans, particularly those in Northern Rhodesia, where there were strong hopes of an early independence.

In 1963, the Central African Federation dissolved, and for a short while the name Northern Rhodesia returned to the country's stamps.

A pleasing definitive set, showing the queen and the Northern Rhodesian coat of arms, was circulated for the short period leading up to independence.

On Oct. 24, 1964, Kenneth Kaunda took Northern Rhodesia into a new era, and the country adopted the ancient name of Zambia.

On Oct. 24, two sets of stamps were issued — a set of three commemoratives bearing the inscription "Independence 24th October 1964" and a larger definitive set consisting of 14 stamps ranging in value from ½d to £1.

The commemoratives of independence.

Zambia, who relied on Southern Rhodesia for technological help, raw materials and a passage to the South African and Mozambique seaports, was hurt by the United Nations sanctions imposed on Rhodesia as much, or perhaps more, than the Rhodesians themselves were.

In addition, in later years Zambia was morally compelled to give a home to guerrilla fighters, and Rhodesian military reprisals were always a constant threat.

None of this, however, is reflected on Zambian stamps which generally showed the optimistic side of life.

Several sets, such as the stamps celebrating the opening of Zambia University, re-stamps became a little more commercial.

Between 1973 and 1974, the country issued ten new commemorative sets, some of which (the Zambian Prehistoric Animals set by far the worst offenders) were clearly aimed at the collectors market (Figure 5).

However, this spell was short lived, and in 1975 the number of sets issued fell to two. This conservative policy has been followed into the '80s (Figure 6).

Mrs. Ellison still continues to design many of Zambia's new issues, and as the new Wildlife stamps illustrate, she has developed a far more mature and realistic depth to her work (Figure 7).

One new characteristic of Zambian stamps is the tendency to issue sets in parts.

For example the current definitive set of 16 stamps was issued in three stages — seven stamps coming out on June 7, a further five in November and the last three in February of the following year.

Similarly, some commemorative sets, such as the recent Minerals issue, have been released in two parts with several weeks between them.

I suppose Zambia is fortunate to have a wealth of
