TIMES PAST

The Wide Streets Commissioners

Notwithstanding the vaunted glories of mid-Georgian Dublin, it then really was a town of mean streets and appalling slums; but the initiative and energy of George Edmund Howard brought about a wonderful transformation. Inspired by a discussion in the "Old Sots' Hole" tavern, Howard drafted the bill whereby he was empowered, under a Commission at the same time appointed, to construct Parliament street.

Afterwards these pioneers in town-planning were embodied as the first members of the Commissioners for Making Wide and Convenient Streets — the "Wide Streets Commissioners" — a useful public body which, during more than a hundred years, worked continuously without any personal remuneration.

The Wide Streets Commissioners were relentless in their operations. Terms of purchase were assessed by specially appointed juries, and tenants who were reluctant to quit — "like peasants on the slopes of a volcano they clung to their mean dwellings" — were dislodged by workmen who, at the time appointed, set about their work of demolition.

After clearing away the worst of Dublin's old "rookeries," the Commissioners undertook a succession of schemes all designed to make a beautiful city: having widened Dame street, they laid-out Lower O'Connell street; and we can realise the slow development eastwards when we remember that O'Connell Bridge was not erected until 1794 — just six years before Westmoreland street was formed.

Pearse street and D'Olier street, the quays approaching the Custom House, the North Strand and Abbey street, and the thoroughfare to the North Circular road, all were planned or widened as part of a scheme of approach to a central point. Other important works were the passage from York street to St. Patrick's and the removal of old buildings from the front of Christ Church Cathedral.

The cost of all this work was met partly by Government grants and partly by special taxes which the Commissioners were empowered to levy and collect.
